Referential Integration: An Emotional Information Processing Perspective on the Process of Integration Article in Journal of psychology and theology 32(3):167-180 · September 2004 with 18 Reads This article contends that the field of integration needs to examine the processes involved in achieving unified conceptual truths about human nature. A theory of emotional information processing (Bucci, 1997) that incorporates the concept of implicit relational knowledge is used to examine Following this, we will discuss the referential cycle in the discovery process and then attempt to demonstrate how this way of processing emotional information undergirds higher-level synthetic conceptualization associated with non-manipulative models and particularly with the unifies integration model. The authors argue that manipulative integration models tend to rely on linear, verbal (symbolic) processing, whereas nonmanipulative integration models require linking nonverbal emotional (subsymbolic) processing with linear, verbal (symbolic) processing; a process referred to as referential activity (Bucci, 1997). Moreover, it is argued that this type of emotional information processing ... - Referential Integration An Emotional Information Processing Perspective On The Process Of Integrati
