This type of friendship doesn't rely on convenience or proximity, but comes from a true bond. In these relationships, both friends' emotional needs are met on a deep level. Beyond that, they occur through sharing major life moments, trusting each other and exchanging intimate thoughts and ideas. In other words, friendship is wonderful, and much ink has been spilled in citing the virtues of having friends. That's not to say friendship is easy, though. It demands time and effort, and it requires that people put someone other than themselves first sometimes. But in exchange for that work, a friend can provide an immense amount of support and comfort in good times and in bad. Keep reading to learn more about the various types of friendship. Friends are supposed to be honest with each other. If you find someone who is brutally honest with you (in a constructive way), then hold on to this person! People like that are hard to come by these days. The perfect friendship. The last of Aristotle's three types of friendship is the ideal one. It's the most solid kind — and the rarest — but it's still possible. It's a friendship that goes beyond utility or pleasure. - What Kind Of Friendship
