You still have the potential to be the perfect parent. And that is by not becoming a parent . Because the true parenting experts are the people who aren't actually parents themselves. The greatest mistake I see parents make is trying to appear perfect to their children. By this I mean never admitting to making mistakes never showing their vulnerability and never letting their humanity show a little. Parents should not expect to receive all their personal fulfillment from their children or from the parenting role. Parents need other activities to fulfill their self-images, and other sources of love and nurturing. They need time to be adults and time for themselves - and a break from children and parenting responsibilities. You Won't Be a Perfect Parent . . . And That's Okay When a parenting failure has you questioning whether you're cut out for the job, remember that no parent is perfect and God knew what He was doing when He gave you your child. - How Not Be Perfect Parent
